This includes models such as the Multi-Tiered System of Supports (MTSS), Graduated Approach Model, and others.

IV. The Positive Behavior Model

At INPS-Shakhbout, positive and exemplary student behavior is reinforced through strategies that are aligned with students' developmental stages, educational levels, and individual needs. For early childhood students (K-Grade 4), we use methods such as verbal praise, visual rewards, and simple behavior charts to encourage positive actions. As students advance in grades, reinforcement strategies include recognition programs, achievement certificates, and opportunities for leadership, reflecting their growing maturity and responsibility.

Our motivation program incorporates both moral and material incentives to support and recognize positive behavior. Moral incentives involve verbal praise, public recognition, and showcasing achievements to foster intrinsic motivation. Material incentives, such as stickers or special privileges, provide additional motivation by offering tangible rewards for adherence to behavior standards.

The program ensures fairness and inclusivity by offering incentives that cater to diverse interests and needs, guaranteeing equitable recognition for all students. By linking rewards to adherence to the Positive Behavior Code, we ensure that every student has a fair opportunity to be acknowledged for their positive behavior, thereby creating a supportive and motivating learning environment.

At INPS- Shakhbout, we clearly define and communicate behavioral expectations to students, staff, and parents through visual reminders and consistent messaging. Positive behavior is reinforced with recognition systems such as verbal praise, certificates, and tangible rewards, while behavior tracking tools monitor adherence.

Supportive interventions, including individualized behavioral support plans and staff professional development, address challenges and ensure effective implementation of the code. Ongoing feedback and periodic evaluation of the reinforcement strategies help adjust practices and maintain alignment with the Code of Positive Behavior, fostering a positive and respectful learning environment.
